The claims

The case involves 13 applications - five lodged by unions and eight by employer organisations - to vary various awards to incorporate provisions aimed at assisting employees to better manage their work and family responsibilities. The unions are being represented by the Australian Council of Trade Unions and the employers by the Australian Industry Group, the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the National Farmers Federation.

From August 2003 to June 2004 conciliation conferences before Senior Deputy President Jan Marsh were held on 15 occasions. This process led to some agreement by the parties on the disputed issues.

Previous Decisions

In the past 25 years the Commission has handed down a number of test case decisions aimed at assisting employees to better manage their work and family responsibilities. These include:

- 1979 Maternity Leave [Print D9579]
- 1985 Adoption Leave [Print F9852]
- 1990 Parental Leave [Print J3596]
- 1994 Family Leave [Print L6900]
- 1995 Personal/Carers' Leave [Print M7000]
- 2001 Parental Leave for Casual Employees [PR904631]

Test cases

A test case in the Commission typically involves a Full Bench hearing a number of identical applications that seek a common award variation. If successful, the variation may become a test case standard, which may then flow through to other awards by application. In such follow-on cases the applicant would not be required to argue the full case, but the Commission may consider modifications to the clause to suit the circumstances or needs of a particular industry. The variation would apply immediately to those awards named in the test case.

Examples of test cases in the Commission include national wage cases (now known as Safety Net Review cases) and the Working Hours Case - July 2002.

There is no specific reference to the term 'test case' in the Workplace Relations Act 1996. The Act does, however, provide for Full Benches of the Commission to establish precedent-setting principles for award variations.
